THEY'VE DISCOVERED PEACE..REALLY?! WHERE?

Dear Reader,

As a human being, I am in awe of the sheer brilliance of human achievement—our architectural marvels, groundbreaking medical advancements, agricultural revolutions, and the relentless pace of technological progress. Even the ever-evolving dynamics of social media captivate the imagination.

But what about unity and peace?

From the dawn of time, we have embarked on an unending quest to create unity and peace—for ourselves and for future generations. Yet, both remain elusive. Why?

We pursue countless religions, all seeking the same goal: peace. We name our children after this very word, yet we struggle to attain the reality of what it represents. We have established the largest organizations in history with peace as their mission, yet the world seems more divided than ever. Why?

Despite our greatest accomplishments, unity and peace remain humanity's most challenging frontiers. We search high and low, tirelessly chasing after them, only to find them slipping through our grasp just as we come close.

No seasoned sailor would dare ignore the laws of the ocean without expecting disaster. Likewise, when we disregard the necessity of peace and unity in our lives, we invite turmoil upon ourselves. Strikingly, some animals have achieved what we cannot.

Certain species work together to preserve their habitats, ensuring survival through cooperation. Trees connect their roots to support one another during harsh seasons. Ants move, live, and labor in perfect harmony.

And yet, we struggle.

The Scriptures offer two essential foundations for peace and unity. First, unity with our Creator, which nurtures our spiritual relationship with Him. Second, peace with our fellow human beings, which shapes our relationships on Earth.

Unity is not just a word or an abstract idea—it is a state of being, a destination we must strive to reach. Nations were formed to unite people under common causes, yet division persists.

At the beginning of time, the Creator shielded us from the dangers of the wild, yet humans have inflicted far greater harm on one another than any beast ever could. We build homes, vehicles, and entire infrastructures for safety, yet we are still not safe from each other. Why? We establish organizations meant to foster unity, yet even these institutions fall into conflict. Humanity is at war with itself—our spirits yearn for the Creator, but our flesh craves the world.

Despite all our efforts, we have failed to construct a lasting unity. We form marriages and build families with the hope that our children will grow up in harmony, yet we struggle to create that very environment. Children are born with blank minds—it is the responsibility of parents and society to instill in them the values of love, care, and unity.

True unity and peace require selflessness—both spiritually and physically. But even that is not enough. There is outer peace and unity, inner peace and unity, and then permanent peace and unity. To attain all three, you must seek the One who is called the Prince of Peace.

He is peace.
